The main difference between an aqueous-lined paper cup and a PLA-lined paper cup is the type of barrier coating used to prevent liquid from soaking into the paper.

| Feature                            | Aqueous-Lined                                                              | PLA-Lined                                                                          |
|------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Lining Material             | Water-based dispersion coating                                             | PLA (Polylactic Acid), a plant-based bioplastic                                    |
| Plastic Content             | Plastic-free depending on formulation                                      | Contains a thin layer of bioplastic                                                |
| Strength                    | Less robust                                                                | Strong coating equivalent to plastic                                               |
| Recyclability               | Easily recyclable in conventional paper streams                            | Difficult to recycle due to plastic layer                                          |
| Compostability              | Certified home compostable;                                                | Industrially compostable                                                           |
| End-of-Life Infrastructure  | Can fit better into existing paper recycling systems                       | Requires industrial composting facilities                                          |
| Environmental Consideration | Eliminates the need for a separate plastic film and can simplify recycling | Made from renewable resources but still requires specialised composting conditions |

PROUD TO ANNOUNCE THAT WE HAVE WON A SILVER MEDAL AT THE GOLD PACK AWARDS

The Gold Pack Awards, a prestigious award that recognises excellence in packaging design, innovation, and sustainability.

A big thanks to The Institute of packaging and everyone involved to help us get to this milestone after only being open for a year!

It's a great motivation of hope to be recognised for our efforts of being committed to creating sustainable, eco-friendly packaging solutions that are accessible and high quality. We have been dedicated to solving problems which we have come across this year. We believe with continuing our efforts in developing 100% biodegradable and home compostable packaging will help speed up the fight against time to reduce plastic waste.

We hope to make our customers aware of the journey of the packaging waste and educate them on the available innovative options.

We're also proud to announce that Bio-Pak has won the Nedbank Business Ignite
"Industry Disruptors" competition!
